A dog helped an injured wild crow. Now they're best friends.

BY KYLA MENON

Antonia Buck sometimes feels like she's a little more than human. Her border collie, Mocha, recently took a liking to an injured wild crow that showed up in her yard in Portland, Oregon. To her surprise, the crow did Mocha's bidding. A large bird once had fallen from a roughly 60-foot tall tree in his yard, leaving a small crowd dead on the path. Mocha had seen the crow in a nearby meadow, playing, twirling, starting at the dead crow and twirling to itself.

"I do have those moments of, I can't believe this is real life," Buck, 37, said. "The Washington Post." Buck named the crow Russell after actor Russell Crowe. The crow's mother came in shortly in case it's a female, they have no idea.

Russell, a crow, enjoys spending time with Mocha, a border collie.
